As to Mastication

Something "fresh" every day, but nothing new under the sun. Here is a foolish physician who insists that human beings should bolt their food because some carnivorous animals do. He mentions particularly the cat and dog tribe. Cats do not bolt their food. Here is another nature fakir. Dogs do bolt it. A dog has forty-two tearing and cutting teeth and no grinders. Man has thirty-two teeth, consisting of four different kinds, well fitting him to eat every variety of food. A horse has forty-four teeth, and God left a space between the molars and premolars (hypsids) for man to insert a steel bit. Gladstone lived to a grand old age and was rarely ill. He enjoyed a well-rounded diet, and late in life attributed his excellent health to his habit of complete mastication. He believed in giving thirty-two chaws to each article of food taken into his mouth, or one to each tooth. I think he went too far. The familiar adage is, "the more time in the mouth the less time in the stomach." But there should be some discrimination in chewing. The man who bites off a mouthful of bread at your table is regarded as a country bumpkin. Polite folk break off a respectable chunk (or more) with their fingers and shove it into the buccal cavity between the upper and lower incisors, thereby robbing eight useful teeth of their duty.
